Among other interesting points: "Where letters have been a vital source for literary biographers, with all their ostentatious revelation and pronouncement, the smaller, casual intimacies of emails, which are increasingly being donated to public archives - Harold Pinter's and Wendy Cope's to the British Library - will offer insights that might, accidentally, be even more enlightening than a stash of letters can be. It seems difficult for us to accept, though, that such works would have had no other use than being deposited in the temple to bear witness of divine support.
